The Sorrow of Wood
Morton Marcus

© Providence College

The author(s) permits users to copy, distribute, display, and perform this work under the following conditions: (1) the original author(s) must be given proper attribution; (2) this work may not be used for commercial purposes; (3) the users may not alter, transform, or build upon this work; (4) users must make the license terms of this work clearly known for any reuse or distribution of this work. Upon request, as holder of this work’s copyright, the author(s) may waive any or all of these conditions.

It is recorded that on his travels Rabbi Nachman of Bratzlav was unable to sleep one night when he stayed in a cabin made of new logs. He was kept awake by moanings everywhere around him, which none of his companions could hear. "It was the pain of the trees which had been cut down to build the house," he explained the next day. "Their grief surrounded me and I could not rest."

The Rabbi was moved by the sorrow of wood, a sorrow that ascends like sap through the trees, as it does through us, drawn upward from the earth until it returns to the light from the highest leaves.

For what has died and gone back into the earth rises through us and lives again. We are nourished from below by hidden springs that drain through the stones with endless wailings that few of us can hear, but through those laments we flourish and dance in the sunlit wind before we return as water to the buried stones.