ALEMBIC
Contributions

April Selley  Atlantis
Betsy Stachura  Nightfall
Jane Lunin Perel  the Candles
Marion Hague  Homesick (American film in Switzerland)
Francis P. McAleer  Night
Patricia Slonina Vieira  Snowprints
Ana Margarita Cabrera  Birdfeed
Bob West  Poem: on pretty women
Michael M. Woody  Wages
Elizabeth Waller-Bilodeau  in line at the bank

Cover  Drawings
Steve Lichtenfels (by order of appearance)

Drawings
Michael Heaney
Karen Maloney
Isabel Taft
Atlantis

You are the light of the world. A city set on a mountain cannot be hidden ... Even so let your light shine before men, in order that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father in heaven. Matt. 5:14,16

A poet participates in the eternal, the infinite, and the one. Shelley’s Defense of Poetry

The city of light grew from a hill; at dawn, as streetlamps flickered off like candles caught in the small wind, it seemed brooding over a nest.

One afternoon the Ocean called Atlantis: the shadows lengthened into water and the city sank to shine only upon the flourescent eyes of fish in the maritime womb. Atlantis left only her egg behind, floating on the waves.

Yet Atlantis will return when her child’s white sepulcher cracks; at daybreak there will be a sun flowing as a river, the nutrient sac of a bird that folds the earth in its wings and intones the universe.

April Selley
Nightfall

Dusk slips over sunset's head — night's on us like a woman throwing off gingham for black velvet.

Betsy Stachura

the Candles

1 White stems rising from the black holes of the candlesticks, brass sticks my Mother gave me for a wedding present.

2
White stems spurting out flame petals: marigolds unravelling and gold roses singed with a crush of garnet.

3
Inside the black holes is the dark behind fire, of the caves where fire burned the bones of animals, of mothers, and hunters before the time the unutterable was given a name.
4
The flames keep swaying, balloons of honey. The blue inside them is the blue of veins in an infant’s eyelid. Staring at them
I feel myself pass through the blue, a swimmer through a boiling lagoon, who arrives on the other side of time beyond before my Mother’s Great Grandmother who lit the candles in the kitchen of dirt floor and hens. Candlesticks of brass and two pillows of goosedown; that’s all her granddaughters would take with them across the ocean for a new life.

5
I am walking in black lace down inside the catacombs where in secret we light the Candles in Spain in our Catholic charade. Moranos, we lied and stole in these caves to return to the God of our Fathers in secret at night, blood, and dread boiling in the ecstasy of devotion.

6
The Inquisitor’s hat burns red over the black shackles of his eyebrows. I will not remain his confidant long. Soon they will discover my trunk and the candlesticks wrapped in black velvet. He will have me put to the rack, then nearly drown me before he sends me into fire, feeds me back into the crimson mouth the blue and twisted stomach of flame.

7
Now in the year 5736 I light the Candles, whispering the Sabbath Blessing. The white stems dissolve as my husband comes home, we bless the wine eat, make love. All the while they sputter their garnet, their lisps of lapis. As we sleep the blueblack of black tulips fills the holes of the brass candlesticks, rolling the lidless eyes of the void, taking in its darkness, giving it back.

Jane Lunin Perel
Homesick (American film in Switzerland)

Sitting in a theater watching a movie:
a messed up cowboy trying to hustle in New York, a coughing, gimpy little Italian guy justs want to see Miami. Through hell by bus they reach that tropical paradise. The cougher dies. The kid next to me says, "Are you from the States?" "Yup," been here since September." He's just back — three months in the U.S.A. Then, "God, that must've really made you homesick!"

Back to people stepping over bodies in the street, beating old men until their dentures fall bloody from their mouths.

Marion Hague

Night

A black African beauty.
An intimate To whom one Confesses All.

Francis P. McAleer
Snowprints

The only tracks in the yard are ones you have made feeding the birds.

Knee deep and calm you possess all the rows of sagging pines, back trees huddling makeshift woods, the compost pile, promised garden.

The only sound is seed skittering across crusted snow like snow itself tumbling against locked windows.

On my turn, I stretch carefully into your strides,
haste spilling more than you ever would.

Patricia Slonina Vieira
Birdfeed

How sad you must depend on us thru winter.

There will be mornings running late we’ll not have time to scatter seed, shred bread; and weeks will come with no room for birdseed in the budget.

Forgive us, when we forget. Believe me, we sometimes neglect ourselves.

But we will try to remember your daily struggles this small way keeping you our little companions in song.

Patricia Slonina Vieira
Poem: on pretty women

I want to be skinny
pared down, like trees in winter stripped of all this useless decoration;
functional, catlike pawing through jungles
in taut limbs;
like the Empire State or the Washington Monument and a thousand flat oceans with nary a wave
or rolling surf, whitecapped;
a placid sheet of glass or stone, stretching,
touching a flat horizon
like Parsons tables and chrome and steel,
contemporary, not rococo.

Ana Margarita Cabrera
Wages

He wears a yellow baseball cap and blows
I guess it’s a police whistle at cars
the little man his too large trousers trailing in the Star Market parking lot as he collects the empty carriages.
— hey, mister, you left your lights on!
He blows his whistle that turns people around and stops cars to caution and all the while he grins and seems to marvel at almost everything, though nothing so much as the electric doors.
I pass and say hello. He grins and nods. I think he’s retarded and I’ll bet they don’t pay him much, if at all.

Bob West
in line at the bank

a child like a bird rolls gum from his mouth onto the floor & stretches it across a tile, then dips & pecks, dips & pecks until the whole bank is laughing and finally his mother sees her baby bird dipping & pecking & picks him up, only not until he’s swallowed his worm.

Bob West

The Tell-Tale Tree

Tree! — the one impulse directed and distorted my reason. But why must you think me obsessed? No! But the tree! It spread its roots into my soul — its uppermost branches raked against my fancy. I could abide it no longer; the tree had to be destroyed before it drove me to madness.

Obviously you question the sanity of one driven to such extremes by the mere sight of a Christmas tree — but I tell you a college student bears no iniquity with less perseverance than the scintillating presence of an opportunity to commit a transgression of such peculiar nature — a joke of such practical proportions. Is it madness to spend sleepless nights eyeing the damned tree, tirelessly regarding its habits, its idiosyncrasies, its every movement? — insane to count each bauble, each ornament, each light, in anticipation of the breathless moment when those blinking winking eyes of eternity would be hounded into oblivion and my ordeal — indeed my mission — should end?

My method would astound you in its clearness, its utter reasonableness. It was exam week and I knew that all would sleep early — that the dormitory would be silent by 2:00 A.M. I chose the waning hours of the night to watch my victim. Each night I perused its bizarre markings for several hours — planning each detail of my vengeance with uncanny accuracy — until fear and detestation hurled me from my watch into a dazed stupor. There was no sleep — my mind dashed furiously onward.

On the fourth night of my vigil, I sensed an aura of dim foreboding about the Christmas tree. As I watched its life flicker before my eyes the rays grew in intensity 'till they threatened to send me reeling back to my room a blind man. I could bear the sensation no more. Repulsion and desperation wrestled for control of my mind as I stumbled toward the ghastly thing. My eyes had become incredibly sensitive — they saw only the hideous leer of the ornaments and those outstretched arms of doom. My mind's eye whirled in a frenzy of delight as I grasped the tree — the hall lights seemed as tiny moons orbiting the multi-colored sun I dragged down the dormitory hall.

I crossed the threshold of my room and with a click all was darkness. I had pulled the tree’s plug from the outlet! I gleefully stuffed the tree in my closet, carefully rolling up the cord and placing it in the floor of the closet — none would suspect me! I fell in an exhausted heap onto my bed and slept my first sleep of many weeks.

The following day saw my confidence increase. I knew of the initial shock of my comrades on the third floor when the absence of the Christmas tree was discovered. I suspected the routine search of each room on the floor, but my plans had been executed so as to leave me blameless. As the resident’s assistant, accompanied by those whose unfortunate task it had been to guard the tree, scanned my room I pranced about with a mien both haughty and misleading. I boasted of the tree’s beauty — I asserted their strongest denunciations against the perpetrators of the outrage, yet with twice the vehemence they had used. That these fools were blind to the irony only increased my confidence — I ranted, I raved — I beat on the very door of the closet in which I had entombed my tormentor!

Convinced of my innocence the R.A. and the others rose to leave. I begged them to stay — offered them drinks — insisted they remain. Need I describe the terror that gripped my soul when, from the crack between the floor and the bottom of the closet door, colored lights could be seen to blink once — then twice — then continued in the rhythm of a death knell? I shivered violently and fell to the floor! Fingers frantically pulled at the closet door and revealed the hideous object — I had sealed the Christmas tree living in the closet!

Michael M. Woody
The Crucifixion

1
Perched
about to fly
you wonder about the ground.

2
Satan struggles in hot ice tepid blood
frothing from his mouth congeals on matted hair.

3
Never has a tree been climbed so gracefully.

4
Can the wood of this chair spit splinters through my back?

5
Golgotha
defends
the dance.

Michael M. Woody
The Dance

Time,
It sifts through my slender young hands
Like an autumn leaf trickling down,
In a thick, balmy breeze.
While it is gliding easily,
With alacrity it drops.

Drifting in middle-air, on an unrestricted course,
I am like the April bud,
With rich, flowing veins, bursting, sizzling, with ardent aspirations.

Ethos and Thanatos

The pleasure of a young, almost fetal love,
Rushes like a choir of crashing grasshopper calls,
Bounding blindly to anyone who'll hear.

Then, the agony of a round woman’s first fall,
Or a late lover’s last gasp, Somehow slither in bearing equal intensity as A spasm in bliss,
Or the rigid throp of beginner’s widowhood.

The days become nights, and the love becomes hate.
All in one dance of a fleeting leaf.

Elizabeth Waller-Bilodeau