THE PROSE POEM:
AN INTERNATIONAL JOURNAL

Volume 4 | 1995

Pear Tree
Susan M. Tiberghien

© Providence College

The author(s) permits users to copy, distribute, display, and perform this work under the following conditions: (1) the original author(s) must be given proper attribution; (2) this work may not be used for commercial purposes; (3) the users may not alter, transform, or build upon this work; (4) users must make the license terms of this work clearly known for any reuse or distribution of this work. Upon request, as holder of this work’s copyright, the author(s) may waive any or all of these conditions.

The Prose Poem: An International Journal is produced by The Berkeley Electronic Press (bepress)
for the Providence College Digital Commons.
http://digitalcommons.providence.edu/prosepoems/
Outside my window, in the middle of our front yard, leans a small pear tree. The trunk is dark gray. It puts out blossoms, skimpy ones on skinny branches. Planted many years ago, it grew crooked even with its wooden tutor. I wanted it out of sight, and when I finally pulled away the tutor, I hoped it would fall over in the next storm, flapping its anorexic branches in adieu.

My husband's mother, until a few years ago, stood straight and strong in her large family. We were close to one hundred descendants at her eightieth birthday. She wore lavender, a soft full skirt, circling to the music of a waltz. Today, stricken with Alzheimer's disease, she sits strapped to a wheelchair, a woolen scarf tight across her chest. Her face is dazed in disbelief. Her eyes are dark gray circles. I look for light in them and find only darkness. Her fingers try to fasten the last button on her sweater.

Today, a postcard of Van Gogh's painting, Pear Tree in Bloom, arrived. Its dark gray trunk is twisted, the branches ugly and crippled. But in the gnarled fists, there are blobs of color, mandalas of white blossoms, surrounded with a few green leaves.