The Working
Louis Jenkins
The job is a minor discomfort, like shoes that are just a bit too tight. Most of us go through our workdays mechanically without thinking about what we are doing. "Hello. Anybody in there?" Our minds are elsewhere. "Hello, hello," the burglar calls out. Nobody home. You've become part of the vast, undulating daydream, swaying in the breeze like prairie grass. The burglar breaks the pathetic lock, empties the contents of the drawers, pulls the books from the shelves... There's your whole life strewn across the floor. The burglar steals the t.v. and the stereo and in return leaves new Visa and Mastercards with your name on them. You won't know this until hours later. This time of year we go to work in darkness, return home in darkness.
