When In Rome
Gian Lombardo
Gian Lombardo

WHEN IN ROME

They greet you at the door. You're looking fit these days, they remark. As they hang up your coat they confer for a moment.

One of them takes you by the hand and leads you to a comer of the room next to the sofa. Another hands you a branch. Someone else drapes a dishtowel from your arm.

They keep coming and going. Each time they place something else on you—an accordion, shark's teeth, stick-on paper stars, a power drill they occasionally run.

Finally, you get so hungry and weary that dinner, or even a drink, would be welcome. Even though you can hardly bear the crush of these objects anymore, you can't help wondering what they'll bring next.